In Sri Lanka, only 7.7% of working age females are engaged in formal employment with decent wages and decent working hours. The country's persistent challenge of low female labour force participation is compounded by a multitude of unique barriers to improving women's access to decent work.

Decent work (<https://international-partnerships.ec.europa.eu/policies/sustainable-growth-and-jobs/employment-and-decent-> work_en#:~:text=The%20International%20Labour%20Organization%20(ILO,employment%20and%20safe%20working%20conditions) is multifaceted, incorporating productive work that delivers a fair income in conditions of freedom, equity, security, and human dignity. Due to the heavier household and caregiving responsibilities falling on women, they face challenges when participating in the labour force and securing decent work.

SECTIONS

The labour market is characterised by several gender-specific challenges. Dr. Nisha Arunatilake, Director of Research at IPS, notes that employers consider women's additional household and caregiving responsibilities when hiring workers, affecting the demand for female workers. Legislation places higher costs on employers when hiring females, including maternity leave and added security expenses. Even when women are recruited, they face constraints and disadvantages in opportunities for promotions and career development owing to their household duties.

EDITORS

Another main issue is the limited availability of decent jobs, especially outside the Western province. About 30% of the jobs in these areas are in the agriculture sector, which mostly comprises vulnerable jobs with low income.

This, combined with employers' preference for recruiting males, further restricts women's access to decent work opportunities.

SPECIAL EDITIONS

A recent IPS study (<https://www.ips.lk/social-economic-and-legal-barriers-to-decent-jobs-for-females/>) revealed that only 8% of the working age population is engaged in formal employment with decent wages and decent working hours. For females, the percentage is 7.7%, lower than the male percentage of 8.3%. The study also emphasised that access to decent work improves when women are English literate and have higher levels of education. Additionally, households with male members in formal work increase prospects for women to enter decent work. Unfortunately, the presence of school going children decreases their chances of decent work as women shoulder increased responsibility for their children's education.

Outdated labour laws still retain provisions that are discriminatory to women. The lack of female representation in decision making committees further compounds the challenges faced by women seeking decent work.

In light of the challenges, the Institute of Policy Studies (IPS), in collaboration with Partnership for Economic Policy (PEP) and Groundviews, hosted the National Policy Conference on Women's Access to Decent Work in Sri Lanka. The conference served as a platform for policymakers and key stakeholders to discuss means of improving women's access to decent work in the country, focusing on two main aspects: the importance of creating decent jobs for women and the role of childcare facilities in enhancing women's access to decent work.

In the discussion on the importance of creating decent jobs, Neelakanth Wanninayake, Executive Director at the Industrial Service Bureau, brought to light that the majority of the Small and Medium-sized Enterprises (SMEs) struggle with issues such as poor quality consciousness, low productivity, limited innovation and diversification. Some of the major barriers to industrialisation including policy issues, lack of access to finance and credit, inefficient infrastructure, lack of innovation and technology transfer and poor entrepreneurial culture, need to be addressed to generate decent job opportunities in the country.

Transforming precarious jobs to decent jobs in addition to the creation of decent jobs was also a point that received attention. As access to decent work significantly differs at the regional level, implementing policies at the regional level was emphasised.

HOME

Gender segregation in the labour market was another prominent issue, with women often confined to certain types of professions, such as teaching and low skilled service sector jobs. As pointed out by Gayani Herath de

Alwis, First Vice Chairperson of the Women's Chamber of Industry and Commerce, in the transport and logistics sector (https://www.unescap.org/sites/default/d8files/knowledge-products/WorkingPaper_MindGenderGap1.pdf), female representation is only 3.4% compared to 96.6% of male representation. A significant factor contributing to this is the limited awareness of job prospects within specific industries that offer decent job opportunities. Ms. De

Alwis emphasised the importance of raising awareness to attract women to decent jobs and ensuring their retainment in the workforce once entered. The significance of having strong male advocates to promote women's engagement in decent work, access to financial and non-financial services and strengthening the linkages in the supply chain while integrating women into the entire value chain are some critical points highlighted by Gayani Herath de Alwis, Programme Manager, Gender and Economic Inclusion, International Finance Corporation Sri Lanka.

Women's access to decent work and childcare services

SPECIAL EDITIONS

Thanuja Jayawardene, General Manager Women's Empowerment at MAS Holdings, highlighted the challenges faced by the private sector in implementing childcare policies in the absence of a coherent national policy. All the panellists agreed it is a societal responsibility to protect children and ensure their sound development in their early years. The two issues that Ms. Jayawardene mentioned regarding creches at the workplace are the cost for the business and the different requirements of varied classes of employees. In the apparel sector, the factory floor and office cadre have different requirements and shifts. But it was reiterated that the apparel sector was built on the backbone of women to whom extensive care and attention should be given.

Another point that the panellist stressed is parental responsibility and parental care. All the experts agreed that child rearing responsibility should shift from the mother to both parents, reaffirming the need for provisions for paternal leave.

Shanthi Malgoda, Director of the Child Protection Authority, highlighted the national guidelines for day care centres (<https://www.groundviews.org/su>)

as a sound tool to maintain standards of care, along with the five year action plan introduced by the Ministry of Women's Affairs.
